Autumn

Help a disorganized child take responsibility for belongings

You bought your child a special notebook where he is supposed to write down homework assignments—but he forgot to bring it home. He needs to turn in his math worksheet—but he left it sitting on his desk at home.

Some kids never seem to learn how to take responsibility for their schoolwork. Here's how you can help:

1. Ask your child to help develop a plan. Talk with him about what he needs to do to get more organized. You might say, "You're having trouble getting to school with all your homework. Can you come up with a plan that would help you remember? Why don't you think about it, and we'll discuss at dinner."
2. Let your child try to make his plan work. That means you won't rescue him. If he leaves his homework at home, don't rush to school to take it to him. Let him face the consequences.
3. Offer suggestions of how to make changes, but let him be responsible. "How about if we try placing a box here by the door? Then you can put everything that needs to go to school in the box. What do you think of that idea?"
